Caring for Children After a Disaster

“There are no magic formulas or single right ways to respond to a child in and after a crisis.”

Avoid too much news media coverage.

Keep in mind, media images can be graphic. Children may have mixed reactions about the things they are seeing. Depending on their age, children may not have the understanding of time and space yet. As a result, they may assume that what they are seeing on the television is close to home. This may cause the fear that a disaster will hit in their neighborhood.

Maintain your daily routine.

Familiar routines and favorite rituals are very important in helping children feel safe. Keeping a regular schedule, especially when the world seems unpredictable, gives your child a sense of reassurance. Make sure children get appropriate sleep, exercise and nutrition. Encourage activity and play since it’s a way for them to grieve and sort through fears and confusion.

Be available.

Listen and honestly answer questions at a level the children can understand. Don’t be afraid to admit that you can’t answer all their questions. Help them understand that there are no bad emotions and that a wide range of reactions is normal. Encourage children to express their feelings to adults (including teachers and parents) who can help them understand their sometimes strong and troubling emotions.

Be flexible and patient.

Respect differences in children – both individual and age-based. Realize children’s behaviors are likely to change. For example, they may have difficulty sleeping, eat less or more than usual, and/or have emotional outbursts, become withdrawn or very clingy. Plan relaxed and pleasant family or group time together.

Take care of yourself.

Rest, exercise, and try to eat regular, balanced meals. Make time for the things you enjoy. Talk with a trusted friend or seek the help of a health professional if needed.
